The State of Utah and the Urban Ag Foundation and will each provide as many as 2,000 meals a week through the summer, officials said. "How can we provide more food for people?" said Kelsey Hollister, an Urban Ag Foundation vice president and director of the Herbert Hoover Presidential Library and Museum. "This could be a big step." Plans for a yearlong pilot project are underway in ten locations around the state, including Salt Lake City, Provo and Logan. The sites for the pilot will be determined on a case-by-case basis. The city of Logan and the Sundance Film Festival have also expressed interest in participating. "We need to address growing concerns around food security," said Lindsay Allred, an Urban Ag Foundation vice president who oversees the project. "We're looking at the impact of food insecurity on the quality of life." The program is voluntary. Drivers and riders will be asked if they would like a free meal if they stop for one of the designated sites. "We'll be doing on-site interviews with a small number of people to better understand the impact it could have," Allred said. Critics have pushed back against the idea of using donated food. "The reality is that donated food does not have to be donated at all," said Amy Fry-Rabaza, co-director of Food Bank Utah, an organization that works to improve food access. "If we are using donated food, then people will be consuming fewer of their own resources." While the program won't be f678ea9f9e
